

Figure 1: The schedule for 12 hours spent in Indianapolis.

The first place to be visited is the Indianapolis motor speedway. The motor speedway is one of the most famous landmarks of Indiana, and it hosts the famous Indy 500. As the museum closes at 5 pm, and is the farthest from the other attractions, it will be visited first. The website to purchase tickets is <http://www.indianapolismotorspeedway.com/>.

The next three places to visit are near each other in the White River Area and have an hour of buffer time between each of them. The first attraction to visit in the area is the Indiana state museum. The Indiana state museum is one of the most diverse museums in Indianapolis: it includes genres of art, science, history, and architecture; so, it can appeal to anyone. The museum hosts numerous exhibits and will thus require multiple hours to walk around.

What better way to know a city than walk in the heart of it? To complement the Indiana state theme, there will be a tour around the Indiana state capitol building. The tour is approximately 45 minutes and will showcase the architecture and the chambers of the capitol building, all while being on the same street as the state museum. The capitol does close at 5 pm, however, so it can only be visited for an hour. That is just enough time to see everything inside. For more information on the capitol, visit <https://www.in.gov/idoa/2371.htm>.

To finish the day in Indianapolis, there will be a walk around Indianapolis' most famous park, White River State Park. Of course, the last two buildings have been in the White River area, but simply walking by doesn't do justice to this park. The park boasts 250 acres of green along with many of the leading attractions in Indianapolis in addition to the previous ones. Also, since it's just a park, you can stay however long you like, but be sure to catch the sunset.
